Moral incentives and economic decision-making

Abstract:

The supernatural sanctioning hypothesis proposes that human prosocial behavior in large groups of strangers could be enforced by the belief in a punishing supernatural entity (D. D. P. Johnson, 2005; D. Johnson & Krüger, 2004; Benjamin Grant Purzycki et al., 2016). Under this hypothesis, prosocial behavior is independent of monitoring and repeated interactions. We extend the consequences of the hypothesis into the realm of moral behavior consistency. Under the supernatural sanctioning hypothesis, we expect that belief in punishing supernatural entity is less likely associated with moral licensing, and moral behavior is thus more stable under such a belief. We test this hypothesis using incentivized online experiments on the Amazon MTurk platform.

Wir freuen uns auf Ihre Teilnahme.
